In the United States, national monuments and landmarks tell America’s stories of history and culture. Historic and cultural preservation is a significant issue for Asians and Pacific Islanders seeking to safeguard important historic places, preserve unique cultural practices, and receive official recognition of civic contributions. However, few sites associated with API history and cultures have been recognized as landmarks. The National Park Service Asian American Pacific Islander Theme Study was developed to tell the layered story of Asian and Pacific Islanders as an integral part of the history, culture, and politics of the United States.

With May as both Asian Pacific American History Month and Preservation Month, we celebrate with a Community Symposium that will bring together scholars, preservationists, students, and the API community to learn about how we can safeguard historic sites and cultural resources and elevate AAPI history into historic preservation efforts, including landmarks and monuments. This Community Symposium aims to engage the public to become more involved in the identification, preservation, and interpretation of historically significant sites and figures, the creation of new historic markers, trails, districts, and national landmarks, and in sustaining existing historic and cultural resources important to our communities.

Asian and Pacific Islander Americans in Historic Preservation (APIAHiP) invites you to support The APIs and Historic Preservation Community Symposium: Safeguarding Our Stories and Places for Future Generations while gaining valuable exposure for your company or organization.
